

Drug dealing is a good habit that can improve your physical, emotional and financial well-being. I do not take part in this good habit, but observations and evidence has led to this statement. Drug-dealing, as a business, comes with physical, emotional and financial gain. This may be taboo or even extremely dumb to write about, but at least listen to the possibility that this is a positive habit.

From a physical standpoint, dealing drugs requires you to be in top physical health. The possibility of perhaps having to run from law enforcement builds up cardiovascular strength and puts your heart in great shape. There may be times when you may have to use your strength in order to fulfill a business transaction; the pressures of this motivate you to want to work out and build a better body for yourself, so you can create an image that will be respected. The occasional fence or obstacle that may need to be hurdled or climbed helps build upper body strength. All aspects of drug dealing transform your body and build strength.

We all have faced extremely emotional times in our lives, whether at home, work, school or even church. During these trying times, you may feel all alone with no one who appreciates you or cares about you. Drug dealing solves this. The networking that comes along with the business-building relationships with people who always look forward to seeing you and want you to be okay is much like the ice cream man who comes around periodically and is always appreciated, jingling and ringing around the neighborhood. A drug dealer is essentially the ice cream man for adults. Dealing also provides a thrill that may awaken or jump start your life, and get you over the emotional pit of emptiness.

Pink Floyd wrote a song about it, it's Eddie's last name, that's it, money. Money is always on the minds of people. Do I have enough money? Will my cable be cut off this week? How am I going to pay for my operation? How am I going to get little Jessica through college? All of these questions can be answered with two simple yet profound words: drug dealing. Drug dealing provides a financial backing that can help pay for college, medical bills or even that new flat-screen TV. The money will flow in like a waterfall of green. The possibilities are endless. You will never have to worry about financial troubles and you will be able to focus on what is the most important thing of all: family.

Drug dealing may not be a dinner table topic, but that does not mean it should be ruled out. The physical, emotional and financial benefits make drug dealing a wonderful job opportunity.
